This method, called seeding, has been very helpful to farmers, and it won him much fame. In 1961 he became director and leading professor of the Atmospheric Sciences Research Center of the University of New York. In 1981, this professor, who had never gone to college, published a highly respected book, A Field Guide to the Atmosphere. He approves of college education; but he believes that, for people who can work on their own, who learn by doing, who read books, who make friends with worthwhile people, and who, most of all, are interested in the world and everything in it, a college degree is unnecessary.
