Before the Europeans began settling in Australia during the early 1800s, there were about 300,000 Aborigines on the continent. But the new settlers brought diseases that killed many of these native people. Today there are only about 125,000 Aborigines living in Australia, many of whom now live in the cities.

The way of life of the Aborigines, who still live like their ancestors, is closely related to nature. They live as hunters and gatherers and do not produce crops or raise livestock. The Aborigines have no permanent settlements, only small camps near watering places.
