In the United States, summer camp is also known as “sleepaway camp” when campers spend their nights at camp. At some camps all campers stay overnight, whereas at other camps – “day camps” – participants go home every night. Summer camp is often the first time that children spend an extended period of time away from home. Missing home is a frequent problem, so it is important to have caring counselors to help campers adjust to the new environment.

Youth organizations, like the Boy Scouts and YMCA, are known for having lots of summer camps. They hold summer camp fairs in different parts of the country during the winter months. These provide the opportunities for parents and kids to meet camp organizers and collect information about summer camps.
