According to the government officials of the Center for Disease Control (CDC), the number of enterovirus cases is getting increased due to the hotter weather recently. Young children, particularly those under the age of three, are especially vulnerable to the enterovirus. CDC experts urge parents to help their young children maintain proper personal hygiene and take disease preventive measures. CDC officials have stressed that adults, too, should take proper precautionary steps since the virus has been known to pass from adults immune to young children.
