Nearly all of us who were still in Taiwan came to the reunion, and we had a great time talking with each other. I found it interesting that what people cared about the most was not our differences. The topic of worldly success now attracted us little. Instead, the conversation we talked a lot was about our various ailments. For example, somebody's leg hurt, somebody's back ached, somebody was telling the story of his heart surgery. One fellow was particularly heroic. He had his kidney replaced. The way he talked about made us tremble. We also recalled the days how we used to play basketball every day at lunch time. If we tried to do the same as before, under the scorching midday sun, I'm sure we would fallen down and died.
