The policemen quickly found out that I was the student's mentor. They called me and asked me to the station immediately. When I arrived, the policemen turned the boy over to me. The policemen also told me that this boy who had spent the night in the train station was obviously not from a poor family, judging by the electronic access card of the apartment and several thousand dollars in the boy's pocket. Before I took him home, I took him to eat sesame seed cakes and fried breadsticks. Even though he wouldn't tell the policemen where he lived, I knew perfectly well. His address was included in the student information kept by the school. Notwithstanding his great reluctance, I finally persuaded him to let me take him home.
