The train to Skye left in the early morning at six forty-five. There were only two people in our compartment: myself and a chemistry professor from Australia. The professor must be a genuine and forthright man. He told me that he had once taken a special train trip from Glasgow westward to the end of the track, and then back along the same line. That train trip was in winter, he said. The scenery outside the train was all mountains and wild plains blanketed in snow.
