Old Wang and I shared a common characteristic. That is, we were both very sensitive to numbers. Hence, we could feel when American interest rates were likely to rise, or when the Australian dollar might fall. When we built a company, we knew exactly how much money we should invest. To be honest, this sort of intuition is more of a gift than a learnable skill. I've often seen people hire teams of so-called financial experts to design lots of computer models, but they were never a match for Old Wang and me. We simply rely on our instincts and experience.
