Although the experts admit that it is probably impossible to stop multitasking altogether, they suggest that people should try to do less of it. For instance, you should only check your e-mail once an hour. It is all right to listen to quiet music in the background while working or studying. However, listening to songs with lyrics, watching television, or sending instant messages will keep you from getting your work done effectively. So, even though you may think you are more productive when you multitask, according to the latest research from leading scientists, you actually probably aren't.
