When the priest knew that I was going to leave the village, he came to see me. He talked for ages! Almost all of the teenagers hate long-winded. Actually, I've already forgotten everything he had said. But now, something come to my mind. I do remember him urging me not to envy others. At the time, I had no idea what he meant. But it wasn't long before I understood.

When I was in the village, I had never envied anyone because everyone was the same. None of my playmates could read, and none of them needed to be able to read. However, in the city, it's quite different. Most of the people in the streets wearing suits and carrying briefcases. They all walked into the office.
