I knew they had gone to school and could read. But I hadn't been to school, and I couldn't read. That was the difference. I started envy others. I envied everyone who had gone to school and could read.

There was a machine in our barracks. The foreman would sit in front of the machine every day and hit the buttons to print things out. They told me it was a computer. I really wanted to work by using the computer, but my lack of the related knowledge made that impossible.

After working for a month, I got the salary. Our foreman told me that I could not keep stashing all my wages in our barracks, and he took me to a bank. It took me quite a while to figure out what exactly a bank was.
